ABOUT BOISDALE

Boisdale is named after the remote port on the beautiful Isle of South Uist in the Outer Hebrides, off the North-West coast of Scotland. Boisdale was home to The Macdonald's of Boisdale – the senior branch of the Macdonald's of Clanranald, the largest and most anciently Royal of all the Highland clans. There are more than six million Macdonald clansmen throughout the world – all of whom can lay claim to this magnificent heritage, which has been charted down the generations since the 3rd century BC.

Boisdale's founder is Ranald Macdonald, the eldest son of the 24th Chief and Captain of Clanranald who launched the first restaurant in Belgravia over 34 years ago. Boisdale continues to capture the essence of centuries of proud tradition with its warmth, informality, and unique atmosphere, simultaneously reminiscent of both a Highland country house and the Batcave in Gotham City!

The Boisdale emblem is derived from a seal stamped into the molten glass of an 18th century claret bottle found in the vicinity of Castle Tiorram, an ancient 14th century home to the Macdonald's of Clanranald. The seal depicts the family crest, a hand holding a sword, representing Clanranald's legendary fighting strength. It indicates the vintage as 1780 and has the crest with the family motto in Gaelic "Dhandeon Co Heiragha" that translates to "He who dares wins". It is now the regimental motto for the SAS, Britain's premier elite military fighting unit.
